Thanks are extended to all at the School of Applied Social Sciences at the University of Brighton, UK. Thanks to Matt Adams for introducing me to benevolent sexism and stereotype content. Huge thanks to Ben Finchman, Hannah Frith, and Anne Dobson for keeping me writing. Katherine Johnson and Dee Rudebeck helped me think through the aspects and impacts of the writing process and offered great support. Peter Coyne, Mark Erickson, Kay Aranda, and Cassie Ogden provided resources and knowledge. Thanks to Angela Meadows and those of the International Weight Stigma Conferences for the opportunity to present and think through some of the ideas contained here. Thanks to my students on the ‘Lifestyle Media and Society’ module where I first started thinking about what was achieved in weight-loss makeover shows; I thank, in particular, Ryan Gingell, Anna Roscher, and Maddy Sheahan, and those who formed part of the Size Matters Interest Group. Paul Andon, Alan Bagnall, Jen Cattrell, Chris Cumming, Karen Falvey, Lynne Farrall, Liz Gunsel, Linda Crook, Paula Lopez, Michelle McGovern, Natalie Pitimson, and Lizzie Ward provided much needed encouragement and cheering on from the sidelines. I would like to thank Brenda Kick, Nick and Charlie Raisborough, Sam Cowing, Chris, Rosie and Alex Forshaw, James Prendergast and Vicky Spiteri, Liz and James Ogilvie, Hannah Prendergast and Joe Feldhaus, and Brian, Terry, Adam and Alex Raisborough for their encouragement and interest. Tilly, who sat patiently through every word. Biggest thanks, as always, to Anne Dobson for her constant lifeline of support. It has been wonderful to work again with those at Palgrave—their patience was much very appreciated. It goes without saying that all blunders are my own and that there would be a good many more without all of these good people.

This book is dedicated to my stepfather Tony Kick, who passed away in April 2015. Wonderful care and support by the NHS (Clatterbridge Oncology, Wallasey District Health) meant that his last year was as full as we could have ever hoped. He made a positive impact on the lives he touched. We were lucky to have him become our family. He is greatly missed.
