ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

No author is an island, and it gives me great pleasure to reflect on all the people whose work, wisdom, and friendship contributed in some way to this book. First and foremost, I am grateful for my family. My parents Yoel and Shoshi Ben-Natan raised me in a loving home filled with books and music. I know my mother would have been immensely proud to hold this book. Its publication in her absence is another painful reminder of her untimely death, as I sorely yearn to see her response. My siblings—Ami, Yoni, Ezra, Yirmi, and Naama—and their families are a tremendous source of joy and support. We are always close, regardless of geography.

My first steps in research as a student in the Department of Hebrew Bible at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem have left a strong mark on my thought. The relationship between philology and exegesis, and their implementation with caution and in context, are the legacy I have adopted from my teachers: Baruch Schwartz, Michael Segal, Lea Mazor, Jonathan Ben-Dov, Menhaem Kister, Emanuel Tov, Esther Chazon, Avi Hurviz, and Nili Wazana.

At Princeton, I acquired the crucial tools of methodology, criticism, and historical and comparative approaches. I am grateful to Peter Schäfer, Elaine Pagels, AnneMarie Luijendijk, Moulie Vidas, Brent Shaw, Jeffrey Stout, and Buzzy Teiser. Leora Batnitzky and Naphtali Meshel engaged in a meticulous reading of my dissertation, and offered valuable points of criticism, which I have done my best to employ while working on this book. Loren Stuckenbruck extended an invitation to join his seminar on the scrolls at the Princeton Theological Seminary, which became pivotal for my research. He is a true teacher and friend.

I also benefited from the friendship of fellow students at Princeton, who contributed to the project by reading drafts, suggesting further readings, and being part of a stimulating intellectual community that nurtured my thought. I have been fortunate to share my graduate school years with David Jorgensen, Gregg Gardner, Levi McLaughlin, Lance Jenott, Rachel Lindsey, Geoff Smith,
